Hazel Trice Edney was born on February 13, 1960 in Charlottesville, Virginia to

Marie Jefferson Trice and Norris Trice. There was speculation that her maternal ancestors were slaves at President Thomas Jefferson's Monticello Plantation. Edney's maternal great-grandfather, Preston Jefferson, was a minister in the Charlottesville area while her great-grandmother, Jennie Jefferson, was a homemaker who took care of their seven children. Edney's mother was born and raised in Trevilians, Virginia, and began singing in the choir at Foster Creek Baptist Church at seven years old. Edney's paternal grandparents, Ethel Brown Trice and William Trice, died when her father was very young, so he was raised by his married older sister, Ethel Trice Thompson. He served in the U.S. Army during the Korean War, where he was injured during a grenade attack, and later court martialed and honorably discharged for defying a direct order against feeding hungry Korean children.

Hazel Trice Edney grew up in rural Louisa, Virginia with her three siblings: Marvin Trice, Queen Trice and Julie Trice. At the young age of three years old, her father taught her to shoot a rifle, so that she could protect herself. Edney began her education at Zelda Carter Morton Elementary School, where she became the president of the 4-H Club. When Louisa County schools pushed to improve integration in 1970, she transferred to Louisa Elementary School. Witnessing the violence between her parents, Marie Jefferson Trice and Norris Trice, and racism during the Civil Rights Movement contributed to Edney's rebellious behavior in school. She attended Louisa County High School in Mineral, Virginia, where she became pregnant at fifteen years old with her son, Monty Trice. During this time, a vision of an angel inspired her to begin changing her views about life. Two years later, Edney's English teacher, Judy Rude, encouraged her to compete in a forensics competition, where she placed first in both poetry and prose.

Hazel Trice Edney became increasingly involved and successful at Louisa County High School was accepted into HBCU, Saint Paul's College in Lawrenceville, Virginia in 1979. After getting into a relationship with Eugene Edney, Jr. they married and Hazel Edney transferred from Saint Paul's College to Virginia Commonwealth University in Richmond where she studied and worked as a security guard. There she pursued her degree interest in television and radio broadcasting. In May of 1984, Edney was physically abused by her husband, hospitalizing her, but a network of friends and supporters came to her aid and she eventually left her husband. Concurrent with those events, Edney had an internship at CBS affiliate WTVR-TV in Richmond Virginia. Upon completion of her internship Edney was offered a news director position at WFTH Radio. Funding cuts two years later forced Edney to leave; she subsequently became a freelance and later full time community and political reporter for the Richmond Afro-American.

Hazel Trice Edney began working at the Richmond Afro-American in 1987. While there, Edney covered stories in Richmond, Virginia's African American communities, such as the inhuman treatment of African American food stamps recipients. Edney also reported on city affairs, including the hiring of minority construction worker in the development of the Twin Towers in Richmond. In 1991, she became the first staff writer at the Richmond Free Press, founded by Raymond H. Boone. There, she interviewed Virginia Lieutenant Governor L. Douglas Wilder, and his response to questions about the death penalty stirred controversy during his gubernatorial campaign against J. Marshall Coleman. Edney also worked with influential writers Samuel Yette and Ronald Walters. Seven years later, Edney was awarded the William S. Wasserman Jr. Fellowship at Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government. She also talks about contemporary cases of racial discrimination involving Marissa Alexander and Trayvon Martin.

Hazel Trice Edney attended Harvard University in Cambridge, Massachusetts, where she was taught by Judge A. Leon Higginbotham, Jr. Through her membership at the university's NAACP chapter, she met scholars Cornel West and Henry Louis "Skip" Gates, Jr. She also heard guest speakers like economist Alan Greenspan and Nelson Mandela, who served as the inspiration for her commencement speech. After graduating, Edney joined the American Political Science Association Congressional Fellowship Program, where she worked under Senator Edward M. Kennedy. At its conclusion, she was hired by executive director Benjamin Jealous at the National Newspaper Publishers Association in 2000. There, she became a Capitol Hill correspondent, covering events like the 2000 U.S. Election scandal and Hurricane Katrina. In 2001, Edney attended the World Against Racism Conference in South Africa, which gave her insight into the growing animosity toward the United States leading up to the terrorist attack on September 11, 2001.

Hazel Trice Edney travelled to New Orleans, Louisiana in August of 2005 to report on the devastation left in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. When Rosa Parks died two months later, Edney was chosen by the Parks family as the only print reporter to accompany them from Detroit, Michigan to the special viewing at U.S. Capital building in Washington, D.C., and then to Montgomery, Alabama for the burial. While working for the National Newspaper Publishers Association, Edney had the opportunity to cover the 2008 presidential election, at which point she interviewed then Senator Barack Obama on his whistle stop train tour of the United States. She also interviewed media moguls Oprah Winfrey and P. Diddy, who supported his campaign. At this point in the interview, Edney talks about a lack of recognition for female leaders in African American civil rights organizations, the importance of accountability and unity amongst African American leadership and the discrimination faced by individuals of African descent globally.

Hazel Trice Edney left the National Newspaper Publishing Association in 2010 after ten years to launch, Trice Edney News Wire, the only female owned black news service. The publication was fully credentialed by the U.S. Congress press gallery, and featured interviews with a variety of influential African Americans, including NAACP president Lorraine Miller, and civil rights activists Reverend Jesse L. Jackson, Charles Ogletree and C.T. Vivian. In 2012, Edney became president of the Capital Press Club, where she was responsible for planning the 70th anniversary celebration. At this point in the interview, Edney describes her current professorship at the Howard University in Washington, D.C. She also talks about being called a racial slur at multiple points in her life, including at Harvard Square in Cambridge, Massachusetts. Edney reflects on her life, legacy and concerns for the African American community; and concludes by describing how she would like to be remembered.
